Customer Reviews
I picked up my copy of this fascinating book on a whim at a library sale, and it’s turned out to be one of my best choices of the past year. A series of letters by a Frenchman on farming life in 18th Century America, it not only offers a wealth of details that enable the reader to visualize everything, but it’s written in comfortably informative prose with a touch of poetry. Both as a vivid description of everyday life & as a naturalist’s impressions of the countryside, it places the reader in the midst of that world, engaging all of the senses. For example, the chapter on a snow-storm takes us through the changes of weather as the storm builds & approaches; pays attention to the farmers, their livestock & their fields; and offers countless little human touches -- as when the farmer finishes sheltering his animals at the beginning of the storm, coming inside in a coat of snow & ice, to be greeted by his wife with a mug of gingered cider beside the roaring fire. You can almost smell the wood smoke & the cider! The letters range over a wide swath of territory, sometimes centering on overall sections of the new country, sometimes providing a close-up of something specific, such as a snake or hummingbird. Both the beauties & the perils of farm life are examined with an intelligent, sympathetic eye. In many ways, this strikes me as a predecessor to Thoreau in its delighted interest in & curiosity about tiny things many people might take for granted, if they noticed them at all. For a book well over 200 years old, it's remarkably readable. What makes it even more interesting is the introduction, which explains that it straddles the blurry border between fact & fiction.
